"Worst thing in the world for weak eyes, young woman."

The young woman looked up from the magazine in her lap and smiled at her gray bearded mentor on the opposite side of the street car. She smiled with her whole face—dimpled chin, red cheeks, full lips; even the eyes behind the convex glasses of her pince nez twinkled.

"Thank you," she said, shutting the book sofily, "I know it. I was merely glancing at the pictures."

Then she turned her amused glance toward the front part of the car, and met the eyes of the driver staring straight at her. His face lighted up when her glance met his, and with his rough glove he in three months he had found it necessary patted the left side of his cont, as though it shielded something which concerned
